Publication opportunities

There is a cry for improving the leadership culture by a new generation of Americans who are demanding more ethics, morals, trustworthiness and authenticity from their leaders. Drs. Carmody-Bubb and Duncan are committed to developing high-powered performers through coaching and mentoring. Their efforts create a legacy that extends the work that will have a positive influence nationwide and internationally.

Doctoral students at CEPA 2016

CEPA 2017 encourages graduate students, faculty, and other CEPA scholars to present their research at the conference and publish their work in the Journal of Collaborative Leadership. This would add to the huge investment in a new generation of leaders.

Two guiding principles — the integration of knowledge and the exchange of ideas — provide a foundation for that vision.

Integration of knowledge: Bold and adventurous ideas are valued in CEPA's ongoing effort to:

- engage scholars and educators from the fields of administration, business, community affairs, education, humanities and the social sciences,
- encourage contributions from all areas of human endeavor while preserving the integrity of each of the various fields.

Exchange of ideas: A diverse membership is vital to quality exchange as CEPA continues to:

- promote the interaction of knowledge, ideas and viewpoints,
- provide meaningful personal participation in conferences, publications and activities.
